Basketball and Playing Out Life

By Shomit Sirohi

Introduction

See it like a film, or radio tape or even voice.

All together spliced – and then make it idealist,

A speech from Lenin also included – all of this was basketball – the movement of bodies, the process of history, that athletic match, my own physician habit, that there is sports, but life is a run through on our side – of intellecting basketball.

In fact, just a process.

Just a rhythm.

One two.

Three,

Four.

Basketball and life, playing out.

'Michael Jordon keeps it neck to neck, the whole, match, my God, he wins when it is at its least, this I call history, all the people cheering, all the history, all the politics, a personal group, a love, he has become a mathematical player, he is in fact outplaying the compromised game, he is just fighting (some call this Lenin's speeches).'

I. What Princeton argues about Black Americans

I heard a story from Princeton and Harvard, I was reading some novel from there, it was in fact an idealist novel, Cornel West told me on the phone. It means the black man plays a sport called basketball, but also has an idealism of it in novelistic forms.

I was then of course, reading that novel.

It played out my life – all its decisions, everything was basketball.

II. A Run

He was catching a bus, Michel Priesten, and even Oram, which was at 4 am, or 5 am, fresh air in the morning, getting ready.

III. A Difficult Problem with Idealism – do I have faith, what is happening?

A group dynamic, a class action, a process.

IV. Basketball

Oram is playing basketball in a court at 7 am, and is then back home.

V. Life plays out a tape-recorder – Am I alright, am I able to be alright.

Women are dying in their room in a motel, they felt, for about one hour.

VI. How do I know.

A year spent playing basketball heals. I am just instead following a novel. It says the modern period has a lot of buses, and people to meet, it seems like black people want that life.

I am playing out basketball, Cornel West argues – as a beat.

VII. Idealism, American Novels

I was in fact like heartbeats playing out love, basketball.

A black man, Iramen, is skipping and playing football, but actually catching then his tennis racket, and then his baseball bat, and checking them, they are getting ready for basketball.
